New York based Graffiti Research Lab (GRL) have landed on the streets (and walls) of an unsuspecting Adelaide – arming its residents with their trademark LED Throwies, laser tags and a fascinating guide to charming authorities.

GRL creators James Powderly and Evan Roth are officially here to run the Graffiti Research Lab masterclass, presented by Carclew Youth Arts in association with the Adelaide Bank Festival of Arts and the Australian Network for Art and Technology - but in typical GRL style, are managing to squeeze in some public havoc along the way.

Roth and Powderly have also coordinated in a number of public events including their exceptionally popular Throwies Workshop at the Adelaide Festival Centre Artspace. As GRL masterclass participant and blogger-in-residence Lachlan Tetlow-Stuart comments; "Like rock concert punters, people massed outside the venue jostling to get a good position. 7:00 came and it was obvious that the numbers had been underestimated…but like Moses commanding his flock, James bestrides the masses commanding submission and compliance".

"What strikes you first about GRL is 'cool'. From James' black wrap-around shades to Evan's Firefox t-shirt, these guys have new-New York down. There's something dominating about their confidence; years of pushing boundaries and standing up for the rights of the 'common people' does that to you... but you can't help but be impressed. And yet they're so laid back they could almost fall off their chairs." Comments Fee Plumley, emerging technologies Program Manager, ANAT.

Lachlan goes onto say, "with a GRL Adelaide in our midst, it is only a matter of time before Adelaide's skyline is transformed into a Mecca for colourfully-illuminated-street-subversion. Propelling the 6th Element of Hip-Hop blazing through the sleepy night of the city of churches, lovingly accompanied by some cranking tunes and good old-fashioned deviant-street-revelry".
